The Relic East of San Diego

Below a low hill stretches a line of forgotten passenger train cars. Doomed after Hurricane Kathleen flooded the area, the owners abandoned the train to the desert. Urban artists took over, and over nearly half a century, their vibrant aerosol art remade this industrial artifact.

Captured in high-resolution full format, this series investigates the dynamic tension between industrial decay, urban art, and the surrounding desert wilderness.

"Somewhere east of San Diego lies a place where light, color and lines intersect into a graphic recollection."

Linear Symmetry & Threshold Framing

Open passageways and aisles guide the eye through layers of painted steel. A setting sun illuminates the entryways, leaving the viewer to discover the story inside the shadows. With the compressed perspective, a new image is created from a thousand lines, images, and words.

Aerosol Pigments & Sunlit Horizons

Shadows accentuate intense colors. Shot with a 100mm lens and a very narrow aperture, the light becomes the focus. This is not documentary photography. This is a photographic experience drawn from a collaboration among street artists, the desert, and time.
