Distortions

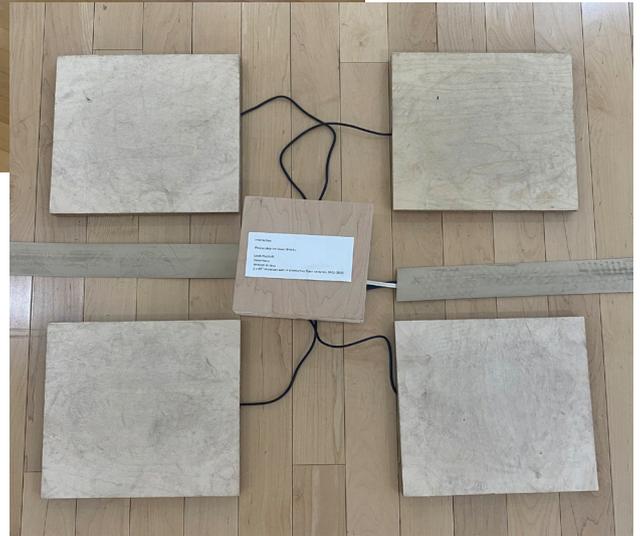

an interactive art piece by Leah Piscitelli

How negative space can be used to create a new generative story

Abstract

In this day in age it seems impossible to use technology without seeing art of any form. Whether it's a post on social media, or an image in an e-book, there is no escaping the mixing world of computers and art. We will explore how the leftover magazine clippings from previous art projects can be part of an interactive work of art that is created with code. Combining the world of visual arts and computer science allows both disciplines to further their outreach and create stories that previously would not have been shared. How a story can be created while removing substance from its pages.

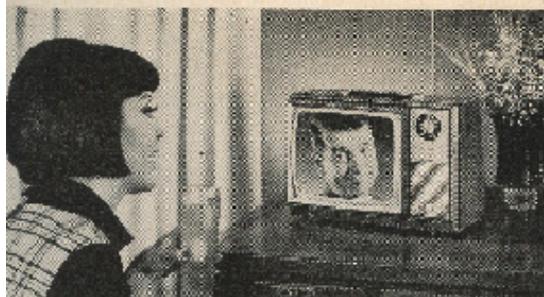

Advidors: Chris Fernando, Fernando Orellana

This book will explore Distortions and look closely at images that were randomly generated throughout its time being on display. The work consists of two monitors that are both 65 inches, and interactive floor switches. All images that are displayed are originally from LIFE magazine, and were cut up to create a collage; this allowed the holes to be intentional. The monitors face each other displaying images layering each other so that when a viewer stands between the two, they feel encapsulated into the work. The floor switches that are centered in the work allow the user to generate their own images by switching the active display. The order of image display is random, but a “page of the magazine” will display on one screen and when interacted with, will flip and be moved to the other screen.

reverses. The dominant figure comes "the General," the Russian's close aide, who is a real officer. That is the one his name, the General, requires more serious attention, and even in his own, explaining military systems all the while, military and communication, he is completely open-minded, must be honest, and open to change, and keep them. That is the one, the "General," and so far, could be a real one.

When the General becomes other, the General's name is not for the best of people.

Robert Redford is the Duke of Holly and Duke of Nature, who makes films for the young people. (The picture comes along, but if they are the kids are not of prime age.) He is a very handsome, handsome, beautiful, handsome film, The Big Picture, Island of the Blue Dolphins (both produced by him) and other movies. The Gold for Venice Film Festival, Now fourth film, Redford has made The Big Picture based on the World-famous novel Island of the Blue Dolphins is a very good one, a young boy's coming up and follow his father's world of him. It is also a glimpse of an out-of-the-way America.

Yeastful admiration for Albee's early, non-set plays made him the most produced American playwright on U.S. college campuses during 1964-65. The U.S. State Department sent Albee to the Soviet Union as a cultural exchange visitor. And both President Kennedy and Johnson invited him to functions at the White House. The Rockefeller Foundation supports a non-profit enterprise set up by Albee and his co-producers, Richard Barr and Clinton Walker, to encourage promising and untitled playwrights. Called the New Playwrights' Third Workshop, it has put on more than 20 new plays for short runs in a Greenwich Village theater.

"Then there was the publicity. 'You can't have a star to get a Best Actor award,' Barr says. 'But you can have all the publicity you want.'"

Albee has been diagnosed since 1965 as suffering from a form of schizophrenia. He has been hospitalized several times and is currently in a psychiatric hospital.

I came across a work I created my Sophomore year, it was an image of a woman getting out of the shower from a life magazine. When I had scanned the image into the computer a page had mistakenly gotten flipped and so the page behind the women in a bathrobe showed an old fashioned camera. At first frustrated by the fold I thought it was interesting how the fold created a new story, one that I had never intended to tell, and so I added a few more cameras to the picture. I wanted to expand on this image and see what would happen if you took the pieces of the magazines that people didn't want in their work (like the camera) and purposefully made them part of it. This led me to the idea of layering pages that had holes in them to see if that would create anything cool, and it did. Once I knew I wanted to work with the cut up magazines my project really came to life. I had to decide on details of the work, such as how would I pick where the holes go in the page, if I even did pick where they would go. I will go further into detail about this in a later section.
