A return from beauty can feel like collapse.

What begins as a quiet shift—disconnection, restlessness, the inability to focus—slowly expands into a weightless kind of sadness. Appetite fades. Motivation dissolves. The world regains its pace, but something within remains suspended.

This series captures that internal dissonance: the contrast between movement and stillness, memory and reality. It reflects a state of mental free-fall—a space between where we've been and where we must return. Not quite sorrow, not quite peace. Just the echo of intensity, and the silence that follows.
