Queen of True Love

She dreamt about him her entire life. Like an imaginary friend that she could call on to escape reality, the promise of his existence gave her hope. Deep down, she embraced the certainty that she would recognize his energy if ever she found herself within his vicinity.

She admits her impatience. Like a wounded victim staring at a lineup through swollen eyes searching for closure, she had wrongfully identified the innocent as her soul mate on more than one occasion. She handed out keys to her heart like a landlord desperate to have anyone move into her suite, so she wouldn't have to face the world alone. Sometimes spending years too long in the wrong relationships. But she's forgiven herself; she's made peace with it. She hopes they have too. After all, she learned a lot during those years—especially about herself. She thinks back to that summer. The ending she swore would be the last. When she vowed to be her own true love. She pledged to invest all that time and effort in herself. And she did. She tamed demons. Then one day under the influence of her best friend's encouragement to try one more time—to just have fun—she made a list. Everything she wished for and everything she'd be. She wrote it on her bedroom mirror. She read it over daily for months.

Looking back now, she cherishes the day they first chatted. Upon their first meeting, when he hugged her and his energy felt so familiar. That first date lasted for hours; their second, the following day lasted the entire day. Every moment spent with him made it feel like time did not exist. Inexplicably, she felt like she was finally home. She craved his peaceful presence more than his attention. She sought his challenging views more than his approval. He was strong, and he made her feel powerful. He saw all the parts she had hidden away from view. He believed in her so much that she believed in herself like she never had before. One night cuddled close to him, she whispered, "I'm giving you my heart. Please don't break it." He gently placed his hand over her bare chest and asked that she not give, but merely share it with him. That her heart was much too valuable and far too precious to be given away to anyone. He requested that she simply expose it to him, allow him to feel the depths of her love, to see the beauty of her soul. Most of all, he asked that she consent to his touching her heart deeply enough that he would forever leave his imprint. Then he handed her two keys—one to her past that she may go back for any pieces she may have left behind, and one to unlock her future so she could explore all this life has to offer her. She realized in that moment what true love really is . . . freedom. No doors, no rules, no chains, no conditions. Just pure freedom.

You too are the Queen of True Love. Know that nothing will complete you more than the sovereignty of your own heart. You must first find self love by contently dwelling in the presence of your own company. Search only for keys to unlock the doors to your entirety. Be courageous enough to share your heart with reckless abandon, but careful enough to not give up its possession. Be as gentle with it as you are with your most treasured gifts.

That magnificent heart is yours to forever hold, Dear Queen. To share, not to give away.

The impact of your love on this world will be your legacy—long after you are gone.

Every Woman is One

As women, we all feel like we have a hundred hats to wear in a day, a magnitude of thoughts to process every moment, and the weight of everyone else's needs and expectations upon our shoulders. In the midst of being there for everyone else, it's easy to lose yourself, to feel isolated and all alone. Embrace those moments, but be sure that they are temporary.

Stand tall. Know that every answer you seek is at the core of who you are.

May our book give you the strength, hope, and reassurance that you are not alone, that we are all connected, and most of all that you are all you will ever need to achieve your greatest dreams and aspirations.

In every moment... YOU ARE A QUEEN!
